Abstract of a doctoral essay at the University of Miami

Doctoral essay supervised by Professor Gary D. Green.
No. of pages in text. (259)

The purpose of this essay is to present wind band conductors with a comprehensive catalog of music written for the medium since the year 1995. This study provides new information and research that, to this date, only existed for orchestral, choral, and pop(s) music. For each work listed, this document provides its date of origin, duration, exact instrumentation, and publisher. There are a number of appendices that further classify the repertoire by composer, title, and duration. The document concludes with a detailed publisher listing, a catalog of numerous compositions about which information is not readily available, and a directory of composers for future study, consideration, and inclusion in this project.

The data for this study are collected through three different methods. The primary method of gathering composition information is through viewing and reading specific composers' and their publishers' websites. The second method includes searching for specific music scores through numerous band libraries across the country. The third method is through correspondence with the actual composer with regard to specific pieces where information is not available through the initial two methods.

It is my intention to present band directors and their ensembles of varying abilities a valuable tool when selecting appropriate repertoire written in the last sixteen years.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

Emergence and Evolution of the Band and its Literature

The development of wind playing has been one of this country's greatest contributions to music performance in the first half of the twentieth century. We have unleashed a force for music making that is unparalleled in the whole history of musical art.¹ With this being stated, the wind band's repertoire has its original roots in the music of the orchestra, opera, and keyboard performance mediums. Whether for commercial or artistic motives, there are numerous examples from the eighteenth century to the present of composers and arrangers transcribing their own works and the works of others for a new medium of performance.² The idea of composing and arranging for the wind band is exemplified in the instrumental medium referred to as harmoniemusik. This term, in the 1830s, was applied to the wind bands of the European aristocracy and the music written and arranged for them. The nucleus of this ensemble, or octet, was comprised of two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, and two horns, which would later serve as the foundation for the modern-day wind band. The principal functions of the harmonie were to provide background music at dinners and for social events and also perform for patrons during public and/or private gatherings. Their repertoire consisted of full-length transcriptions, usually arranged by the director of the ensemble, of opera and ballet scores. When composers, such as Mozart with his wind serenades, ceased providing original works for this medium in the mid-nineteenth century, the wind bands relied on military music and transcriptions from the symphonic genre for programs and performances.³

For almost a century and a half after these initial works for band were composed there was relatively little repertoire written that was originally intended for this medium. Although symphonies for band by Berlioz and Wagner existed, the majority of the original concert band literature consisted of marches, dance pieces, and medleys, while the remainder of the repertoire comprised arrangements and transcriptions of the symphonic repertoire.⁴ Later, in the early part of the twentieth century, Vaughan Williams, Holst, and Grainger introduced new and important works for the wind band medium. Following this in the 1920s and 1930s, people such as Edwin Franko Goldman did much to promote original band compositions. Finally, the decades of the fifties, sixties, and seventies saw a dramatic transformation and need in both the literature performed by college bands and the ways in which college conductors saw themselves and their medium.⁵

Today, the band is perhaps the only medium that continues an essential characteristic of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century instrumental ensembles, a tradition so alive and dynamic that most of the music played at every concert is new music for the medium.⁶ Holvik's article states, "...there is so much new music being written for band that it is impossible for the individual conductor to examine more than a fraction of it."⁷ Band directors consider this activity a sign of health for the artistic and educational future of the medium. Part of this output of brand-new compositions is due to the numerous annual commissions and competitions instituted by individual high schools, college bands, and educational organizations at all levels. For instance, the College Band Directors National Association, one such educational organization, has numerous individual commissioning processes happening at all academic levels to promote the writing of new band music.⁸

This rapid development of new literature creates challenges for the profession. Some new problems include the need 1) to review and reform the training of band directors, 2) to determine selectivity and quality of the new repertoire, 3) to redefine the band director's role in music education and society, and 4) to classify and organize an extremely broad spectrum of literature across the medium.⁹ It is this final challenge that this author wishes to address in the following essay.

Justification and Purpose of the Study

With the emergence of a vast new repertoire for the wind band over the past twenty years, there remains a serious lack of organization with regard to the cataloging and indexing of these compositions. Nearly all performance mediums, including but not limited to orchestral, opera, choral and chamber ensembles, possess up-to-date catalogs or texts that index all pertinent information about their respective repertoire. However, no such resource exists at present for the wind band and its music. The chief purpose of this study is to catalog and index all of the music literature written for wind band in the years 1995 through 2010. As evidenced in the forthcoming literature review, William Rehrig has already accomplished this same project through the year 1996 in his text The Heritage Encyclopedia of Band Music.¹⁰ However, as previously mentioned, there is no catalog or book that continues this work after the years 1995/1996. Since music today is published and distributed in many ways, including literature published by major companies and composers self-publishing their own works, such a project is needed for the wind ensemble field and medium. My essay includes an extensive catalog of wind ensemble repertoire and provides information detailing the composer's name, birth and death dates, compositions, and nationality. It also presents for each work a specific numeric formula indicating the exact instrumentation of the piece as well as its publisher. Appendices include a title and duration index, publisher contact information, and composer nationalities for programmatic purposes. I hope the completed study will supply and serve as a valuable tool and resource with regard to contemporary band composers and their compositions.

Guiding Questions

1. Since there are numerous types of music written and arranged for band today, as in original compositions, arrangements of popular music, transcriptions of symphonic repertoire, and medleys of movie music, which pieces will be included in this study?
2. The wind ensemble/band varies with regard to the number of performers and instrumentation. For the purposes of this study, which compositions will be included with specific regard to the number of players the piece employs and its overall instrumentation?
3. Since wind ensemble music can be found in a variety of places through a variety of sources, how will all of this included music be accumulated, compiled, and located?
4. When a certain composition is included in the study, what specific information will accompany each of the citations and how will that aid the reader of this study?
5. After completion of the actual composition catalog, will the study contain any appendices for further means of organization and classification?
6. What is the target audience for this study and how will that influence the repertoire selected to be included in this project?
7. Does this study warrant further consideration after its completion?

Definitions

Throughout the study, I use various terms interchangeably. First, the words band, wind ensemble, wind band, and concert band are to be understood as designating a large, performing ensemble composed of wind instruments numbering twenty or more instrumentalists. I use these four terms synonymously much as composers for the medium do. For example, pieces in this study include Frank Ticheli's Vesuvius for Concert Band, Stephen Bryant's Concerto for Wind Ensemble, Joel Puckett's Blink for Wind Band, and John Corigliano's Circus Maximus, Symphony No. 3 for Band, all pieces which employ a large number of wind instruments numbering twenty or more players. Next, the terms repertoire, literature, and compositions are all to be understood as the pieces of music, written and/or transcribed for band, that will be catalogued in this study. Finally, the words indexed, catalogued, and cited are used interchangeably to describe the specific ways in which all of the music is gathered and classified. The actual study itself, in its most basic form, can be accurately described as a band music catalog.

REVIEW OF RELATED LITERATURE

Overview

The daunting task of compiling and indexing band music from the past fifteen years would present an even greater challenge had there not been precedents set by other researchers in other fields who deemed the idea a worthy project. And while this project presents a number of obstacles to overcome, knowing and reviewing how others have dealt with and solved the specific problems that I also faced was a great benefit. I reviewed numerous articles and books of similar scope in order to gain insight on shaping a project of this magnitude.

There have been numerous reference books published that accomplish the very same task I set out to complete. However, these books catalogue and index compositions from the orchestral, operatic, choral, and chamber music repertoire. These publications have served as a principal guide and model for my research and, as evidenced in the review of literature, are invaluable resources for directors and conductors in their respective performance fields.

As mentioned in chapter one, the sole purpose of this project is to provide today's band director/conductor with a resource cataloging wind ensemble/band music from the year 1995 through 2010. Currently, there are three publications in print that achieve this for the band medium, but these texts only index repertoire through the year 1995. I also realize that as this study is being written, new music is constantly being published, rendering the study almost immediately out-of-date. It is my intention to frequently and continually contribute to this resource, making it a lifelong project and a valuable resource for today's band director.

Books and Publications Indexing Band Repertoire and Discussing Its Origins

Frank Battisti's book, The Winds of Change, The Evolution of the Contemporary American Wind Band/Ensemble and its Conductor, focuses on the development, history, and literature of the modern-day wind band/ensemble. This comprehensive book, published in 2001, is divided into various chapters that include but are not limited to the beginnings of the band and modern wind ensemble, innovations, changes in instrumentation, expansion and new connections, and commissioning. Part 2 of the book contains essays on topics important to the contemporary wind band. These chapters include discussions contributed by various authors on a taste for quality music, expression and emotion, the advancement of the wind band, beyond music teaching and conducting, and the Pulitzer Prize in music. The third and final part of the book contains an extended discography and bibliography section followed by numerous appendices. These appendices include a twentieth-century chronology of selected wind band literature, recommended twentieth-century literature for all levels of contemporary bands, and recommended readings including dissertations, books, reference dictionaries, and journals.¹¹

Kenneth Berger, in his book Band Encyclopedia, covers a large amount of published band music up to the year 1960, which is a severe limitation, as numerous publications and compositions have appeared since. The book is put together in various chapters which include an introduction, band beatitudes, band dictionary, band bibliography, band discography, band trades, municipal industrial and professional bands of North America, United States college and university bands, great bands of the world, and corrections and additions. This book lists all band music classified alphabetically by title, plus the names of the composer and/or arranger, publisher, and copyright date. Each chapter has its own subchapters to better help organize the information. All chapters contain different types of classification, chronological, by subject, or alphabetical. Many of these chapters have their own index along with pictures and illustrations. There is also a reference-cited page at the end of each section and a general index at the front of the book. There are cross-references, but these cross-references remain within one single chapter and no cross-reference covers the entire book. There is an extensive bibliography and discography covering much of the repertoire in the book.¹²

Berger also edited and compiled a separate volume entitled Band Music Guide. In this book published in 1962, he discusses titles of band music, methods, and materials of all publishers. The chapters are laid out and include band titles, band collections, solos and ensembles with band, band methods, marching band maneuvers, fanfares, and publisher information. The entire book is classified by title only. The book also contains copyright dates, publisher information, and composers and arrangers. Berger also writes a key to all abbreviations and symbols that he uses throughout. There is one section that discusses how the author uses English equivalents of foreign words and title organization with regard to the use of definite articles in various languages. For example, if the name of the composition begins with the article “the,” “la,” “el,” “un,” and/or “das,” the piece would then be alphabetized by the second or following word in the title. There are no indexes, and pieces listed do not contain duration, instrumentation, or any national/programmatic classification. Again, like many of the aforementioned titles, this resource is severely outdated, while literally thousands of wind compositions have been written and published since its publication, further exemplifying the need for a current and up-to-date resource.¹³

In 1997, David Clark, Jon Gillaspie, and Marshall Stoneham wrote and published the book Wind Ensemble Sourcebook and Biographical Guide. This text is an incredible resource for anyone researching the history and conception of the modern-day wind ensemble. It is separated into three major sections that are in turn split into smaller sections. Section 1, entitled “The Phenomenon of Wind Harmony,” contains six subsections within. These subjects include music for all occasions, English-speaking countries, France, German-speaking countries, Italy, and the periphery. Under the subsection “Music for all Occasions,” the author discusses wind bands worldwide and their settings, wind harmony and scorings, wind harmony in the musical scene, military and Civil War harmony, repertoire, nationalism and ethnic issues, new music, and journals for winds. In this section, the part that most interests me and has aided most in the research process is the section on the birth of a wind repertoire. Under the subsection of English-speaking countries, the topics highlighted are wind music in public places, private bands, church and Masonic bands, military bands, the concert tradition, empire and commonwealth, and more. The third subsection within the first major section, ¹³ Kenneth Berger, Band Music Guide (Evanston, IL: The Instrumentalist Company, 1962).

France, covers music before and after the revolution as well as nineteenth-century revivals. The fourth, fifth, and sixth subsections all focus on wind music and their place in other countries around the world including, but not limited to, Germany, Italy, Russia, Iberia, and Distant Empires. The first major section of the book concludes with an extensive bibliography, notes, and cross-references. The second major section of the book, and another useful part for my research, contains biographical information on composers and arrangers of wind band music. This section, which spans over 200 pages, contains very specific information on composers including birth and death dates, birth and death places, famous compositions, and instruments written for. The third and final major section contains information on instruments, performance practice, instrumental development, and aspects of authenticity. This section also contains its own bibliography, notes, and references. The book concludes with a general index containing composers, subjects, keywords, and instruments.¹⁴

Frank Cipolla and Donald Hunsberger, in 1994, published an annotated guide to wind band music entitled The Wind Ensemble and Its Repertoire, Essays on the Fortieth Anniversary of the Eastman Wind Ensemble. This book is separated into three chapters. The first chapter, “The Wind Band: Origins and Heritage,” contains essays by various scholars and authors that discuss the wind ensemble concept, the early American wind bands, the American brass band movement, before the brass band, and the British band era of Holst and Vaughan Williams. There are numerous citations and cross references related to wind band music that are classified within a concert program. These concert programs listed and the repertoire performed all were presented at various concerts and conferences throughout the past fifty years of the Eastman Wind Ensemble's existence. There are specific dates and locations for every concert cited. This section is not particularly useful to me except for the fact that it is beneficial to see what the major band conductors of the day are performing with their ensembles. The second chapter, "Studies on the Repertoire," covers more of what my study will entail. The chapter contains articles on the wind music of Stravinsky and Wagner and the marches of John Philip Sousa. There are, however, no indexes in these few articles that include the location or any other information about these compositions. The third and final chapter contains contributed articles on the international origin and spread of the wind ensemble. These articles include the influence of the American wind band on the continents of Asia and Europe. The book concludes with appendices classifying and indexing various aspects of the Eastman Wind Ensemble, including their complete repertoire, a catalogue of compositions by composer and title, and a discography. The dates of these catalogues are rather limited, as they cover the years 1935 – 1992. No publisher or duration information is given and the repertoire listed is given within a concert program only.¹⁵

The next book, Composer Index and Band Music Guide, A Bibliography of Band Music (1962), is a bibliography of band music that contains music written for the medium through the year 1962. Even though it is listed as a bibliography, there is no information that will help the reader find the actual piece of music or any other pertinent information. It contains a complete alphabetical listing of all composers and arrangers of all band music printed in the United States and a few selected foreign regions. It was written to serve as a companion piece to Berger's book, Band Music Guide, but no author is given or listed. This particular text simply contains the composers' names and all of their works. There are no cross-references, composition dates, publisher information, indexes, and appendices. There is also a brief chart in the introduction showing the reader how to interpret certain symbols, codes, and abbreviations throughout the book.¹⁶

David Daniels, in his book Orchestral Music, A Handbook, has compiled and organized a vast majority of the orchestral repertoire in an index form. The repertoire is listed by composer's last name, which is followed in each case by birth and death dates as applicable. Then, Daniels indicates the name and date of the composition, instrumentation, publisher, and the piece's overall duration. This extremely useful resource also contains appendices where works are listed by instrumentation, duration, and theme. Daniels also indicates and discusses other resource books, institutions and organizations, and online sites. In the opening pages, Daniels gives a very detailed description of the book and how to interpret its symbols, abbreviations, numbers, and codes. There is a title index along with a list of publishers with all pertinent contact information. I am interested in using the structure and design of Daniel's book to create the same kind of index for contemporary band music. In its fourth edition, the indexed information, classification, and layout serves as both a model and an example for my essay and research.¹⁷

¹⁶ Composer Index and Band Guide, A Bibliography of Band Music (Evanston, IL: The Instrumentalist Company, 1962).

¹⁷ David Daniels Orchestra Music, A Handbook (Lanham, MD: The Scarecrow Press, 2005).

In 2007 Frederick Fennell wrote the book Time and the Winds, A Short History of The Use of Wind Instruments in the Orchestra, Band, and Wind Ensemble. This book finds its origins in a series of ten lectures, The Development of the Orchestra, which were prepared and delivered to the service men and women who visited the music room of the Fifth Avenue USO Club in San Diego, California. This book itself is nothing more than a brief history of wind instruments and how they found their way into the orchestra and ultimately, the modern-day wind ensemble. There is no index of band compositions, but the book is a useful resource with regard to the origins of the repertoire I will be cataloging. Chapters 1 through 3 discuss wind instruments and their usage in the orchestral setting from Monteverdi through Stravinsky. Other composers, such as Bach, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Berlioz, Wagner, and Debussy, also have considerable information devoted to them. Chapter 4 is devoted to the music and marches of John Philip Sousa while Chapter 5 discusses the band in an educational setting. The final chapter illustrates the modern-day wind ensemble, its instrumentation, its place in an educational institution, and its musical repertoire. The book does contain, at its conclusion, a keyword and subject index covering the entire text.¹⁸

Richard Goldman's book entitled The Concert Band, published in 1946, provides a comprehensive history of the creation of the concert band. It is limited, however, by its publication date, in that it was written over fifty years ago, and since that time the concert band has seen significant change in repertoire and instrumentation. This book is beneficial for the researcher with regard to the wind band origins. Subjects covered in this book are the nature and development of the band, the modern concert band and its instrumentation, the functions of the instruments in the band, band arrangements and transcriptions, major band programs in the United States, original repertoire for band, and the bandmaster/conductor. The book concludes with a selected bibliography and a comprehensive index. The index, arranged alphabetically, contains composers, musicians, instruments, and compositions. There are no citations or indexes on publishers and where to find the selected music that is covered.¹⁹

Goldman's second publication, The Wind Band (1961), is separated into four distinct and informative parts. Part one, "The Band as a Music Heritage," talks about the band today and its European origins and the history of band music in the United States, past and present. Within the section "History of Band Music" in the United States, Goldman discusses repertoire from the revolution to the Civil-War era, the Gilmore times (1829 – 1892), the John Philip Sousa era (1854 – 1932), the Goldman Band and their new music (1878 – 1956), and new musical directions. The only drawback of this section is that it only covers repertoire up to the year 1956. The final section of this first part, entitled "Contemporary Bands," analyzes numerous types of performance mediums, including professional, service, university, college, high school, community, municipal, industrial, and symphonic bands. Part two focuses on technical problems of the band including instrumentation, arranging, and scoring. The third part is exclusively dedicated to the band and its repertoire. This section helped my study greatly when researching the beginning and emergence of the band repertoire. Some of the topics include the band repertoire and its development and original band music from 1760 – 1960. A major limitation of this book, however, is that there is no index for the music listed and music is only included through the year 1960. The fourth and final part discusses techniques and innovations improving the modern band. The elements for improvement mentioned are tuning, seating, part assignments, general musicianship, repertoire, equipment, conducting, and teaching. There are also numerous pictures throughout that are indexed and described after the table of contents at the beginning. Finally, the book concludes with a selected bibliography and index.²⁰

In 2001 Ian Lawrence published the book The Twentieth-Century String Quartet, An Historical Introduction and Catalogue. I chose this text on string quartet music to see how the different performing mediums compile their literature and repertoire. It ultimately helped to determine how I wrote and indexed my final document. The book begins with a basic introduction discussing the modern-day string quartet and a need and justification for cataloging the medium's works. The following section is listed and described as a database and is where every published piece is indexed and catalogued. Each citation of a work contains the composer's full name, the title and date of the composition, the publisher, and country of origin. It is important to note that this 529-page section contains compositions classified alphabetically by the composer's last name. The first appendix, which parallels my study, classifies all composers and compositions by nationality or country of origin. The second appendix provides a brief reference guide to selected composers' string quartets within a general range of their works and within the context of other contemporary string quartets. This general range is intended to demonstrate the breadth of the composers' interests during the periods in which the quartets were being written. The third and final appendix lists all publisher information and music centers used in the text. Addresses are given for all entries as well, which parallels my study. The book concludes with a brief biography of the author Ian Lawrence. I used this text as a model with regard specifically to appendix 1 and 3.²¹

Teaching Music through Performance in Band, edited by Richard Miles (2010), is an essential, seven-volume work that every band director today should possess. It is separated into two very distinct sections with major contributions from band directors and scholars around the world. The first section of each book contains articles by the most influential names in the wind-band and music-education fields, including Larry Blocher, Ray Cramer, Richard Miles, Edward Lisk, and Eugene Corporon. These articles focus on subjects such as the teaching of music, repertoire selection, conducting, assessment of student learning, using teacher resources, running an effective rehearsal, curriculum, and elements for a successful band. These topics are at the forefront of the band field today. The second section is entitled “The Band Conductor as Music Teacher” and contains numerous pieces from the band repertoire that are analyzed and indexed. Its primary function is to serve as a teacher resource guide. Each piece analyzed contains detailed information on the publisher, the date of publication/edition/revision, duration, composer information, composition information, historical perspectives, technical considerations and issues, stylistic considerations, musical elements (melody, harmony, rhythm, and timbre), and form and structure. Under this last heading, form and structure, the piece cited is analyzed fully by section, measure, event, and scoring. At the end of each analysis, the author/contributor gives a suggested listening list with all pertinent information, as well as an additional reference and resource bibliography guide. Finally, each article contains specific author information including name, credentials, and educational institution/affiliation. The book ends with a major index for the whole book as well as for other volumes. This index is arranged by title, composer, arranger, transcriber, and title. This invaluable text has been an exceptional resource for my study with regard to composer listings, composition names and durations, and publisher information. Despite its extreme value, one limitation to this work is that only a few selected pieces and compositions are chosen for annotation. It is not a comprehensive list by any means.²²

In 1991, William Rehrig published the reference book The Heritage Encyclopedia of Band Music, Composers and their Music. This two-volume book is an extremely comprehensive study of a vast majority of the band literature written up to the year 1991. Volume 1 contains composers and their works with last names starting with the letters A – N, while Volume 2 has composers with last names starting with the letters O – Z. Each composition entry contains the composer's name and dates, a brief biographical sketch, references and citations, known works and compositions, known arrangements and transcriptions, publisher information, and the date of the composition. The volumes also contain extended appendices that include an overview of band music in America, a brief history of publishing practices, glossary of publishers, band journal citations, research on American band projects, and title indexes. This resource has its limits, however, with regard to date of compositions included, as it only cites pieces of music written up to and including the year 1991. As opposed to my study, this book contains no index that includes composer nationality, programmatic features, and composition length.²³

In 1996, Rehrig released a supplement to the two-volume encyclopedia. However, it too has its limitations due to its only including music written in the years 1991 – 1996. Each entry contains the composer's names and dates, a brief biographical sketch, references and citations, known works and compositions, known arrangements and transcriptions, publisher information, and the date of composition. This supplement also cross-references the original two-volume set with regard to composition list exchange. For example, works listed in this volume under composer Gabriel Allier are to replace the works listed in his entry in volume 1. The language reads, "...Replace list of music, from Vol. 1, pp. 11 – 12, with the following:". The book is laid out in chapters that include composers and their music, bibliography, glossary of publishers, and a general index. There is also a composer cross-reference where information is cited and locations are given about composers and where they can be found in previous volumes. For my study and project, this resource is yet another fine departure point and model, in that it has been fifteen years since a comprehensive band repertoire index has been compiled and completed.²⁴

William Scott's book, A Conductor's Repertory of Chamber Music, Compositions for Nine to Fifteen Solo Instruments, covers a large amount of the music for small wind ensembles. Published in 1993, it is an index that contains the composer's name, the name and date of composition, the exact instrumentation of the piece of music, and the publisher. Each entry is, however, missing an important piece of information, which will be included in my study, the duration of the piece. This resource is highly organized and contains a list of instrumental abbreviations used throughout the text, a list of music publishers, an introduction to the history of conducting chamber music, and the actual repertory. It concludes with classified subjects including compositions involving strings, woodwinds, brass, harp, keyboard, saxophone, and percussion. There is also a title index and a general bibliography of sources for these selections. Despite being a great resource, this book is limited to wind compositions up to fifteen players. Because of the specific number of players needed for the aforementioned repertoire and the extensive information given on each piece, I used this book as a starting point from which to begin indexing and compiling band music from 1995 to 2010.²⁵

Barbara Secrist-Schmedes, in her book Wind Chamber Music, Winds with Piano and Woodwind Quintets, An Annotated Guide (1996), catalogues a large part of the wind chamber music repertoire. Much like my study, it contains a very detailed preface indicating how the book should be used and the exact meaning of each and every abbreviation. For instance, “p” indicated that a piano is to be used while “eh” means the piece calls for English horn. The catalog is divided into sections with regard to the actual instrumentation. For example, chapter 1 contains music that calls for two winds with piano while chapter 4 contains music that employs five winds with piano. Within these chapters, the compositions are classified alphabetically by the composer’s last name. Each piece listed contains the composer’s name and dates, the date of the composition and its duration, the publisher, the instrumentation, and for some works, a brief annotation. The first appendix, following the index of compositions, contains a key to the music sources used throughout the book. These music sources primarily consist of abbreviations of publishing companies. The second appendix lists all publishers and their contact information alphabetically. Within this section, one can locate the address, telephone number, country, and fax number of each publisher used in the book. Because this publisher index is extremely thorough and informative, I have replicated this section when cataloging band music publishers and all information relevant to them. Appendices three and four directly refer to information for record companies and sound recordings of the chamber music listed. Next, the author provides an extensive bibliography along with an index, classifying composers by their last name. The book finally concludes with a brief biographical sketch of the author and her credentials.²⁶

The book Wind Bands and Brass Bands in School and Music Centre, written by Kevin Thompson in 1985, is intended for those concerned with the wind bands and brass bands in schools and education. The author considers this to be a handbook. As with any handbook it is essentially programmatic, and the main body of the text is concerned with method, material, organization, and historical and present day issues. The book is divided into four parts, each with subparts within a larger section. The first part, entitled “Origins and Rationale,” contains historical and present-day perspectives on the concert band as well as a rationale for band in present-day educational institutions and music centers. The second part, “Class Band,” discusses the band in institutional settings, writing for specific classes, and innovative examples of instrumental teaching. “Wind Band,” the third part, contains information about bands including an introduction, putting an ensemble together, rehearsal techniques, writing for the band, and repertoire for the band. The fourth and final part focuses on the brass band movement with regard to its conception, rehearsal techniques, writing for the medium, and brass band repertoire. The book ends with a bibliography section followed by an alphabetical index. The bibliography is particularly useful, as it cites not only books, but also scores, journals, and articles as well. It is the bibliography, in my opinion, that serves as the most effective section of this text.²⁷

Compiled by David Wallace and Eugene Corporon, the book Wind Ensemble/Band Repertoire (1984) indexes wind ensemble/band music, instrumental solos with wind ensemble/band music, and voice solos/choirs with wind ensemble/band music through the year 1984. The wind ensemble music listed is for instrumental mediums ranging from six to sixty-five players. There is a diagram in the opening pages describing to the reader the instrumental numbering system that the two authors use to give the instrumentation for each piece listed. This numbering system closely resembles the one that I employ in the present essay. The final numbering system will be thoroughly discussed in the following method section. There is a very detailed guide to all abbreviations used throughout as well as a publisher contact list. With regard to the compositions indexed, the authors provide the composer, the title, the instrumentation, and the publisher. There is also a very detailed source list in which the authors document additional sources and source books that can be used to obtain more information on a certain piece of music. There is no general index or any appendices.²⁸

An Annotated Guide to Wind Chamber Music, for Six to Eighteen Players (2004), by Rodney Winther, is an index of wind chamber music that contains annotations for each composition cited. One major limitation to the book is that it specifically cites works that employ only six to eighteen players. This has been yet another good departure point for my study, as the latter compiles and cites music for larger groups. This highly organized book is divided into sections including the author's top 101 compositions, a general index by composer and instrumentation, and ensemble music with six players through ensemble music with eighteen players. Each number of players has its own chapter devoted to it. The text concludes with appendices including endnotes and publisher information. Various indexes include classification by composer, page number, title, and instrumentation. Within each chapter, the listed compositions are organized by the ensemble type and instrumentation rather than by composer or title. However, once the instrumentation is established, the entire repertoire that falls into that classification is listed alphabetically by composer's last name. Winther provides the composer's name and dates, the title of the piece, when it was composed, the composition duration, the publisher, the difficulty, and discography. The actual annotation to the piece of music contains the author's opinion on certain performance and compositional elements including validity of the piece, what the musicians can and cannot learn from it, and some programmatic features of the work itself. It is this study that helped me determine the information that is provided and omitted in this project.²⁹

Articles Discussing the Origins and Classification of Band Repertoire

Along with the aforementioned books, there have been numerous articles written on band repertoire with regard to its origin and evolution. I have chosen the following articles because of their strict attention to band repertoire and its overall quality and conception. These articles also aid in the collection and indexing of band music from the years 1995 – 2010.

Karl Holvik's article "An Emerging Band Repertory, A Survey of the Members of the College Band Directors National Association" (1970) includes a study of compositions most frequently performed on programs from the years 1961 – 1966. With the dates listed, therein lies the problem. This is a wind band repertoire study from those years and does not include any information past the year 1966. As this author is planning on indexing music from the year 1995 – present, this study with regard to date and time is not relevant. However, it is useful when researching the emergence of repertoire and composers for the wind band medium. The list of compositions includes the title, composer, arranger, transcriber, and how many times it was performed in the aforementioned years. It should be noted that this study is completely subjective, since it cites music that wind ensemble composers chose of their own free will to perform. The author's method of compiling the information, along with and which schools/conductors replied, is also discussed thoroughly. The study includes concert works, marches, show tunes, solos with band, and transcriptions. There are no citations and the credentials of the author are not listed.³⁰

Holvik, along with David Whitwell, later published the article “The Emergence of a New Band Literature” in 1976 as a follow-up study to his previous publication. One particular aspect of this article that has greatly aided in my research is that the opening pages discuss the history and origins of the modern band and its repertoire, which subsequently serves as the introduction to my entire essay. Whitwell then continues to further investigate the emergence of a repertoire through the twentieth century. He discusses the career of Frederick Fennell, the birth of the Eastman School of Music, the wind ensemble movement, and other professional organizations that sought to commission new works for the band medium. The author also speaks about how such a rapid development of literature creates challenges for the profession and that every new piece of music written is not a great piece of music. The article highlights certain committees, such as the College Band Director’s National Association (C.B.D.N.A.) Commissioning Project, that are fully devoted to the study of the repertoire and its newest and most prolific composers. The main limitation that I am concerned with is that this article, though extremely useful, was written over thirty years ago. The article ends with the statement referring to this time period (1970’s) and its excitement for this new and emerging medium.

However, since this article has been written, there have been hundreds of new compositions and composers that have emerged onto the wind band scene.³¹

In 1977, Donald Hunsberger published an article in The Instrumentalist entitled “Repertoire for Wind Conductors.” This article is based on a clinic – session on wind repertoire and programming presented by the author at the 8th National Wind Ensemble Conference, in February 1977 at Northern Illinois University. Donald Hunsberger is the former conductor of the Eastman Wind Ensemble. This article discusses wind ensemble music, effective programming, repertoire choice, and conducting. Hunsberger then lists compositions by order, in his opinion, of merit. The first set lists ten compositions that he feels are the hallmark works for wind band. These compositions include works by composers such as Dahl, Dvorak, Grainger, Husa, Mozart, and Stravinsky. It is important to note that these lists are purely subjective to the author. The pieces are listed with their corresponding composers, but the publisher, duration, and instrumentation are not listed. The next set of pieces, which the author indicates as second-tier pieces, is listed in the same way as the first with composers such as Benson, Copland, Hanson, Holst, and Strauss. Both the first and second lists contain ten original works for wind band. The third list, containing over thirty pieces, is organized by composer and includes pieces that could have been added to the first two lists and also may be considered as landmark compositions. Hunsberger also gives criteria by which he chose these particular pieces. This interesting article is useful when looking for worthy wind compositions, but for my study there is little valuable information, since all of these wind pieces have been previously indexed. It would serve as a powerful tool for a college band director looking for quality repertoire to perform with his/her wind ensemble. The article does not contain a bibliography, but there is a brief biography of the author, Donald Hunsberger.³²

In 2005 David Kish, in his article “A Band Repertoire Has Emerged,” replicated Karl Holvik’s study “An Emerging Band Repertory, A Survey of the Members of the College Band Directors National Association.” Kish’s work was initiated in 2003 to ascertain if a band repertoire has emerged during the past forty years. Both Holvik and Kish showed enthusiastic support of the replication. The participants for the current study only approximated the original. Programs used in this research were taken from the program listings published in the College Band Directors National Association (CBDNA) report. This article is extremely useful, as almost all of the music in the 2005 study will be indexed in my research and study. The results are meticulously illustrated and the search criteria are notated as well. Over 11,000 individual performances were entered into a computer database and the composition list from 2005 is placed adjacent to the initial list compiled in 1970 for comparison. The current inventory produced 149 concert pieces and twenty-one marches. The current study lists the most frequently performed compositions along with their composers. Composers that were listed most often were Sousa, Ticheli, Holst, and Vaughan Williams. There is, however, no indication of performance time, publisher, and/or instrumentation. The article concludes with remarks from both researchers, findings from the study, a comparison section between the two projects, and a bibliography for further reading.³³

Conductor and music educator David Whitwell published numerous articles on wind band repertoire throughout his career as a band director. In his article “Bach – Wind Music of the 18th Century” (1966) he discusses the wind contributions of Johann Sebastian Bach. The article highlights certain pieces by Bach that contain larger sections of music using only winds. There is a list of compositions included as well. In the listing, the author gives the reader the name of the piece, its catalog number, and instrumentation. There is also some discussion with regard to period and authentic instruments of the eighteenth century. This article is useful in that it briefly traces the beginnings of the band repertoire as we know it today. A short bibliography containing wind repertoire and an author biography that conclude the article.³⁴

Whitwell’s second article, “Beethoven’s Siegessinfonie for Band” (1977) discusses the wind band contributions of major composers from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Composers covered include but are not limited to Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, and Rigel. Where they are listed their compositions are mentioned as well. This article is particularly useful when studying the origins of the wind band and its repertoire. The article also addresses the events of the time that may have influenced the creation of the wind band as a performance medium and the programmatic nature of each of the compositions, with particular attention given to Beethoven and his military marches. There are also lists of instruments used and instrumentation for these ensembles. There are, however, no indications of how to acquire these pieces and publisher information, which I have included.³⁵

In 1966 Whitwell, in his article “Liszt – His Music for Winds” (1966), writes about the music of Franz Liszt and his output for winds. The article talks about the life of Liszt and how he came to write for the wind band, along with the programmatic features of his works. A few pieces are listed, but there is no information given about any of them with regard to publisher, duration, and instrumentation.³⁶

In 1965 Whitwell further discusses repertoire in his article “The College Band: Can it Escape its Heritage?” The focus of this essay is on the heritage of the concert band in the college classroom setting. There is no discussion with regard to original repertoire and its classification for band, but the author does discuss the transcription and its place among contemporary band pieces. Also, there is significant information listed about band conductors and their lack of professional experience. Whitwell states that the band, with regard to quality repertoire, is in a state of crisis. Throughout the article, there is no mention of actual repertoire and composition information. The only aspect of the article that has been useful for my research is the brief description of the college band and its heritage. The primary argument is that bands, in the early part of the twentieth century, played and performed music transcribed from the orchestral medium. It is not my intention to belittle this repertoire, but my essay strictly focuses on wind music transcribed, arranged, and written in or after the year 1995.³⁷

David Whitwell's final article, entitled "Three Crises in Band Repertoire" (1965), discusses a rising problem in the band repertoire. The article is separated into three distinct phases in history. In Section One, entitled "The First Crisis: 1917 – 1928," the author discusses the use of wind instruments with regard to Berlioz, Wagner, and Stravinsky. Whitwell also highlights the fact that at this point in time many major composers of orchestral music had not written for the wind band medium and that this is why a serious repertoire had not arisen. It wasn't until 1920 that an actual band composition contest, put in place by Edwin Goldman, had been administered. Whitwell states that at precisely the time serious composers were ripe with interest in wind instruments there occurred the greatest flood of new transcriptions. The second section of the article, entitled "The Second Crisis: 1938 – 1944," focuses on much of the same material that was covered in the first. Whitwell discusses how the world wars facilitated a need for the military band. It was this military band medium that received most of the attention with regard to repertoire. However, 85 percent of music for this medium was still transcriptions. The third and final section, entitled "The Third Crisis: 1956 – 1965," further discusses how the transcription serves as the main source of material for the wind band medium. The focus of the entire article is that the wind band, compared to the orchestra, lacks a repertoire of merit and quality. The article does not list repertoire, publisher information, and composition information. There is no bibliography, but the article contains a biography of the author stating his credentials. As with all of ³⁷ David Whitwell, "The College Band: Can it Escape its Heritage?" Music Educator's Journal 4, no. 1 (June/July 1965), 57.

Whitwell's articles, one can find extremely useful information with regard to the band and its repertoire, but the reader must pay particular attention to the limitation and fact that it has been at least thirty years since they have all been written and/or published.³⁸

As evidenced from the above books and articles, there is a serious need for an up-to-date catalogue indexing the most current wind band music available. I intend to compile and index music for the band medium from the year 1995 – 2010. Once completed, the essay will serve as a tool for the modern-day conductor with regard to locating and gaining useful information about current repertoire and contemporary composers.

METHOD

With the review of related literature complete, it remains only to describe the limitations, resources, method, and organizational plan for the essay.

Essay Limitations

As with any major project of this scope, there are certain limitations I have implemented in order to effectively and properly complete the study. As indicated, the essay contains an index of band music from the year 1995 through 2010. I chose these specific dates due to the fact that the Rehrig encyclopedia and the Corporon study have covered and catalogued all wind band music previously written, from its inception through the year 1996. Whether new compositions, transcriptions, or arrangements for the medium, this fifteen-year span saw a major growth with regard to repertoire. For the purposes of this study, only published and copyrighted compositions and transcriptions are included. Published music includes pieces and transcriptions published through major music companies, such as G. Schirmer and Carl Fischer, as well as music sold directly from the composers themselves through their personal websites or by other means available. Compositions including soloists and solo groups with wind band accompaniment are also included. Despite their inclusion in the Rehrig band encyclopedia, arrangements of popular music, show tunes, musicals, and movie music are not included. Likewise, the marching band music and the athletic band genre are not included. As evidenced in the literature review, two comprehensive texts index and catalogue literature written for chamber winds. These two chamber music catalogs cover wind band music that employs five to nineteen players, which consequently is why I have chosen to begin this project with compositions requiring twenty or more parts and/or instrumentalists.

Method for Compiling Compositions

The most difficult and time-consuming task that I faced with regard to this study is the actual accumulation and compilation of compositions. I used numerous publisher catalogs and their respective websites, including but not limited to J.W. Pepper, G. Schirmer, Carl Fischer, and Shattinger Music. To obtain more information and useful lists of repertoire, I traveled to the Midwest Band and Orchestra Convention and the College Band Director's National Association convention to hear numerous concerts of newly published music and to visit the exhibition booths of numerous contemporary band publishers. For composers who publish their own works, I consulted and examined their various professional websites to gather all important and relevant information with regard to their wind ensemble music. Furthermore, the College Band Director's National Association (C.B.D.N.A.) and the American Band Master's Association (A.B.A.) sponsor a wind repertoire consortium and commissioning project where numerous contemporary composers submit their newest pieces to be considered for publication. These composers and their compositions were viewed on the current C.B.D.N.A. and A.B.A. websites. Particular attention was also paid to the New Grove Online Encyclopedia and to the Rehrig encyclopedia, since it is this text that indexes and cites all the wind band music before the year 1995. It also served as a valuable resource, most notably with regard to identifying lesser-known composers of band music and served as an excellent starting point for this essay and the following catalog. Along with these paper and electronic sources, I also interviewed and consulted with colleagues, conductors, and instructors in the field today who are directly involved with and know of the composers who are writing and publishing for the contemporary wind band medium. Once every one of these sources was consulted and exhausted, all material found was compiled into one complete and comprehensive band repertoire handbook.

Composition Listing and Citation

The actual composition citation, which will serve as the major section of this essay, provides the reader with basic, yet important, information. All of the pieces are listed and classified by the last name of the corresponding composer. However, I also include, as an appendix, a complete list of pieces classified by composition title. Along with the composer's name, his/her country of origin and dates of birth and death, if applicable, is provided. If not all information regarding the specific composer's place and date of birth is available, then as much information as possible or that was found is supplied. Also, for programming purposes, another appendix compiles all listed composers' names by nationality. After the composer is listed, all of his/her band pieces are cited in alphabetical order by composition title. This full title also includes all pertinent information including key signature, date of composition, and/or opus number, where applicable. Following the title information, the exact instrumentation appears through the use of a specific numeric formula, which will be discussed in more detail in the following paragraph of this method section. Next, I provide the names of any editors and/or transcribers that have adapted or arranged the composition from another source or medium. Certain abbreviations, such as ed. and/or trans., have been used to define the editor's role with regard to the specific composition. These and all abbreviations are fully defined in the opening pages of this project. Then, I give the duration of the piece, using numbers to indicate minutes. For example, if 10' is listed next to a certain composition, then it should be understood that the piece is approximately 10 minutes in length. For all lengths listed, it should be understood that these durations are approximate and will vary with each conductor and performance. The next piece of information provided is a basic listing of the publishing company or the composer's website where the composition can be found. Although the listing contains a very brief description or abbreviation, I provide an appendix with more detailed information and all significant publisher contact information for further use. Finally, I list the specific composer's works that were written before the year 1995. For these pieces, all information, except the exact instrumentation and numeric formula are given. As a result, the reader is given a complete and comprehensive list of compositions written by that specific composer. The following are four examples of the basic layout of a musical composition listing/citation that will be found in this study. Examples 3.1, 3.2, and 3.2 are pieces composed after 1995 while Example 3.4 was written before 1995. This model is a hybrid version of the various texts that I discussed in the review of related literature.

Instrument Formula

After careful review of numerous publications, as evidenced in the review of literature, I have devised a very specific numeric diagram for the composition's instrumentation. Much like the Daniels' book, each set of numbers designates a certain instrumental family of the wind ensemble. Each individual number itself indicates how many different parts there are for a particular instrument within that specific family. For example, the number 2 found within the instrumental formula should be understood as showing that there are two separate parts for that specific instrument. For the purpose of this study, the instrumental families of the wind ensemble are defined as woodwinds, brass, percussion, and auxiliary. Each of these numeric groups and families is separated with a dash (–), indicating that a new family's instrumentation is beginning. All instrumental abbreviations will be clearly outlined and defined in the opening section of the essay. The first set of numbers is reserved for the woodwind family, which are then followed by the brass, percussion, and any auxiliary instruments. Should there be a solo or solo group, their instrumentation will appear at the outset of the diagram, before the initial woodwind family. Like the instrumental families, soloists will also be separated by a dash (–) and will be written in all capital letters to further distinguish them from the following groups. Below, I have given two detailed diagrams to serve as examples for further use of the following study.

Example 3.5.

FL – 2 2 2 2 4 – 4 3 3 1 1 – timp – 4 perc – hp – pn – db

The above instrumentation diagram should be understood as follows.

Flute solo
 2 flute players/parts
 2 oboe players/parts
 2 clarinet players/parts
 2 bassoon players/parts
 4 saxophone players/parts
 4 horn players/parts
 3 trumpet players/parts
 3 trombone players/parts
 1 euphonium player/part 1 tuba player/part timpani
 4 percussion players/parts harp piano double bass

As with any music in any genre, auxiliary instruments are employed throughout certain instrumental groups and families. For instance, many times in the flute section the piccolo is called for while the English horn is used in the oboe section. There are also pieces where a certain musician is asked to play two instruments that are written on a single part. Examples of this include a bassoon part where the instrumentalist is asked to perform on the bassoon and contra bassoon, or a clarinet part where the player is required to double on the Bb clarinet as well as the bass clarinet. In this case, the exact instrumentation is placed next to its corresponding number within a bracket ([]). The numbers inside this bracket are further separated by a dot (.), which carefully delineates one player/part from another. However, a slash (/) is added to indicate to the reader that the instrumentalist is required to play two different instruments, such as the clarinet and bass clarinet. The slash (/) also symbolizes when a player and/or a conductor has two or more instruments to choose from for a particular part. For example, numerous pieces in this study call for either Eb Contralto Clarinet or Bb Contrabass Clarinet. When the player has the option of playing either instrument covering the same part, it will be notated as cacl/cbcl. Auxiliary instruments will always be listed after the basic instrumentation for every instrument family. For example, if there are three separate flute parts and one piccolo part, the listing will be notated as 4[1.2.3.pic]. All of these nuances have been taken into account as well and can be seen in the numeric illustration below. Once again, as previously mentioned, all abbreviations will be carefully defined in the opening pages of the study.

Example 3.6.

The above instrumentation diagram should be understood as follows.

- 3 flute players/parts with the third player doubling on piccolo
- 2 oboe players/parts with the second player playing only English horn
- 4 clarinet players/parts with third player playing only Eb clarinet and fourth player playing only bass clarinet
- 3 bassoon players/parts with third player doubling on contrabassoon
- 4 saxophone players/parts
- 4 horn players/parts
- 4 trumpet players/parts with fourth player playing only piccolo trumpet
- 3 trombone players/parts
- 2 euphonium players/parts
- 2 tuba players/parts
- timpani
- 2 percussion players/parts
- 1 piano player/part with the part being played on either piano or celesta.

With regard to the numeric diagram, the reader should also be aware of a number of assumptions and generalizations I make regarding basic instrumentation. First, all clarinet and trumpet parts are in the key of Bb unless otherwise indicated. When a “4” is written and indicated for the saxophones, it is to be assumed that the parts the composition requires are alto saxophone 1, alto saxophone 2, tenor saxophone, and baritone saxophone (as seen in example 3.5). Finally, the last trombone part should always be understood as composed for and to be performed on the bass trombone. Any changes in the aforementioned instrumentation will be specifically notated with the appropriate instrument abbreviations.

Conclusion

The overall layout of the essay has been divided into four distinct sections. Section one is a preface outlining how the findings and listings can be read and deciphered. It includes a legend with regard to reading the instrument formula I have created for illustrating the instrumentation of each composition listed. The second section includes any and all abbreviations used throughout the entirety of the study. These abbreviations include but are not limited to instruments, ensembles, publishers, and pertinent adjectives. The third and largest section includes all of the compiled band literature, which will be systematically indexed and catalogued. The fourth and final section contains a number of appendices I believe are relevant to the study. These appendices include an index listing compositions by duration, an index of composers listed alphabetically and by nationality, a title index classified alphabetically, a list of compositions that employ solo, vocal, and/or obscure instruments, a detailed list of publisher information, a catalog of music where an insufficient amount of information was obtained, and finally, a list of contemporary composers to be considered for involvement in this project in the future. These final two appendices will appear in the actual catalog once all information with regard to musical compositions is obtained. The essay will finally conclude with a brief biography of the author.

APPENDIX 7

COMPOSER CATALOG AND WORKS WITH MISSING INFORMATION

All Composers and their Catalogue of Works in the following Appendix are incomplete and are therefore not included in Appendix 1, 4, 5, 6, and 7. Every effort is being made to complete these composer catalogues. Once all the necessary information is obtained, the following composers will be added to the aforementioned appendices.

Abbreviation Key for Appendix 7

NDT – Need the DATE that the composition was written

NDU – Need the DURATION of the composition

NI – Need the INSTRUMENTATION of the composition

NP – Need the PUBLISHER of the composition

- If there are no abbreviations next to a particular piece of music than all information for that particular composition was obtained.
- If a particular piece contains a solosist, and the soloist is known, than that specific abbreviation will also be included.
- The specific pieces will be listed in the same format as the catalog.
